Chief Engineer William Hood of the Southern Pacific system, under whose personal supervision the Ogden-Lucan cut-off across Great Salt Lake was built, will arrive from San Francisco in his private car Friday morning at 7:10, and half an hour later will leave on a special train for a thorough inspection of the great engineering feat which has excited the attention and admiration of railroad engineers since its inception and final completion.

Accompanying Engineer Hood on the inspection trip will be General Manager Baneroff, General Superintendent Davis, Chief Engineer Ashton, Division Superintendent Manson and other prominent officials of the Oregon Short Line and Southern Pacific systems, and the trip of inspection will determine the character of the breakwater to be constructed to protect the grades, fillings and tracks across the vast body of water during high winds and storm periods.

The impression obtains among railroad officials that a heavy timber breakwater should be constructed, as soon as possible, on the western section of the cut-off, where waves roll mountain high and at times submerge the tracks, making train service perilous.

done on the eastern end of the cut-off is effective in protecting the tracks where the water is comparatively shallow, and it is not thought a breakwater will be necessary for that part of the cut-off. The heavy rock now being used on either side of Bagley station is effective in minimizing the danger of washouts in those districts, and the six work trains now in service will be kept busy until a solid wall of heavy stone protects the tracks for several miles adjacent to Bagley.

Superintendent Manson returned last night from a trip of inspection across the cut-off and says the waves were mountain high all day Wednesday and washed out great holes on either side of the tracks on top of the grades. The riprapping protected the sides of the embankment, but the waves rolled over the tracks and dipped out fillings from the top. These holes were filled in by solid rock as fast as the stone could be hauled from Lakeside and when Superintendent Manson left the lake last night everything was in good condition across the entire cut-off.

The result of Engineer Hood's trip of inspection on the cut-off will be looked for with general interest by railroad men and the public of this locality.

LIGHTS WILL BURN ON BRIDGE

VIADUCT ACROSS THE YARDS IS NOW IN SERVICE.

End of Travel Over the Old Road Leading to West Weber—Flag Men Are Relieved.

The viaduct was in general use today by the traveling public and was well patronized by both pedestrians and vehicles. The electric lamps on top of the structure were connected up this afternoon and the big bridge will be nicely illuminated tonight.

Fences will be completed tonight across Twenty-fourth street, at either end of the viaduct, and section men will begin tearing up the plank crossings over the railroad yards Friday morning, thus cutting out travel under the shadow of the big structure.

The general watchmen and flagmen, so long employed in waving the red flags on the Twenty-fourth street crossing, will be taken off tonight and transferred to duties elsewhere—and this marks the closing of travel across the yards on that street for all time to come.
